INTRODUCTION

1. Following the treatment, in the Preliminary (1988) and Second Reports (1989), of the substantive consequences of an internationally wrongful act - cessation (Art. 6), restitution in kind (Article 7), reparation by equivalent (Arts. 8, 9), satisfaction and guarantees of non repetition (Article 10) - the present report deals with what we referred to as the "instrumental" consequences of an internationally wrongful act. 2/ Be it as it may of a distinction adopted only for the purposes of a more orderly discussion, the present report addresses itself to the legal issues arising in connection with the measures that may be taken by the injured State or States against a wrongdoing State. As in the reports submitted by us so far, we shall deal, in principle, with the measures in question as applied or applicable in the case of delicta, namely of ordinary wrongful acts. References may have to be made, of course, to more or less analogous issues arising in connection with international crimes of States. These issues, however, are to be reserved in principle - in conformity with the outline submitted in the Preliminary Report - at the appropriate, next stage. 3/

2. The task the Commission is called upon to perform with regard to this part of the topic differs, however, quite considerably from that it has been performing so far with regard to the substantive consequences, as defined, of an internationally wrongful act. Two capital features characterize, de lege lata and ferenda, the régime of instrumental consequences (countermeasures). Firstly, one notes a drastic reduction, if not a total disappearance of those similarities with the régime of responsibility within national legal systems which make it relatively easy to transplant into international law, in the area of the substantive consequences, what a high scholarly authority indicated, more than half a century ago, as private law sources and analogies. 4/ As regards the main substantive consequences (with the only exception, in a sense, of satisfaction) the international "legislator" faces legal problems so similar to those the core of which has been settled for centuries in national law, that the essence of the legal relations between injured and wrongdoing State can be envisaged in terms not dissimilar from those of the analogous institutions of national systems. However numerous the issues which lend themselves to alternative solutions, the Commission had thus little difficulty, thanks to such marked analogies, to make the essential choices with a high degree of confidence in their ultimate soundness. With regard to the régime of the instrumental consequences, on the contrary, a comparative study of "corresponding" problems of national law - namely of the rules governing the ways and means to ensure the cessation of wrongful behaviours and the making good of the physical and moral injuries caused thereby - lead one to the very opposite conclusion. Whether one looks at the practice or the doctrine of international law in this area, hardly any similarity can be found.

2/ Preliminary Report, op. cit., para. 15.

3/ Ibid., paras. 15-16

3. The second capital feature is that in no other area the lack, in the "society of States", of an adequate institutional framework weighs so much in determining the features of any existing or even conceivable regulation of the conduct of States. We refer in particular to those two aspects of the sovereign equality of States - to the principle of which the Charter commits us all - which consist on one side of the tendency of any State large, medium or small, not to accept as a rule any higher authority above itself and on the other side of the contrast between the equality to which every State is entitled in law and the factual inequalities which tempt stronger States to impose their economic if not military power despite the principle. It follows that, except in infrequent and circumscribed hypotheses, the model represented by the remedies against wrongdoing which are available in national societies is of little avail to the international "legislator". To put it bluntly by a very old image, at no other time does the "Emperor" appear to be so "naked" as he appears at the moment when one moves from the rather satisfactory rules on the substantive consequences of State responsibility to the study of the available ways and means of redress. The fact that this is obvious to the point of appearing trite does not reduce in any measure the difficulties to be faced at this juncture.

4. Indeed, the practice is abundant but increasingly varied in quality and often very hard to assess. At the side of a bulk of cases of classic reprisals resorted to within a strictly bilateral framework but of frequently doubtful conformity to the presumable best understanding of old norms and United Nations Charter rules, one finds two major developments. On one side there is the timid and not very successful attempt at institutionalization, at universal or regional level, of impartial ways and means. On another side one must register cases of partial collectivization of measures on the part of rather occasionally concerted groups of States against a current "wrongdoer" mostly outside of the tendentially universal institutional framework: practices which, while keeping in a sense within the classic bilateral "injured State - author State" pattern, do not seem to offer, whatever the merits of each particular case, the indispensable guarantees of regularity and objectivity. One has pains to identify at times the exact content of some of the general rules put into question by some of the said unilateral practices; - uncertainties are manifest in the doctrine of the so-called "self-contained" régimes; - and it seems hard to identify the trends of further development of the law and the direction in which the Commission could prudently devise improvements to propose to the Assembly and ultimately to States. One of the crucial aspects of the latter part of the Commission's task appears to be the devising of the ways and means which - by emphasis on the best of lex lata or careful progressive development - could reduce that important source of concern which is represented by the impact of the great inequality revealed among States in the exercise of their faculté (and possibly obligation) to apply countermeasures. As we noted in our Second Report 5/ - although not without challenge - the secondary rules on cessation and reparation are in a sense relatively more "objective" than many primary ones. Their provisions operate in fact to the equal advantage or the equal disadvantage of all States, because any State, whether weak or strong, rich or needy, can find itself with equal frequency in the position of injured State or lawbreaker. Be it as it may of the substantive consequences, such is surely not the case with regard to countermeasures. Failing adequate third party settlement commitments, the powerful or rich can more easily enjoy an advantage over the weak or needy in the exercise of the means of redress in question.

5. Whether the Commission will be able to do more in that respect in the future remains to be seen. At the side of the positive factor represented by the elimination of the main source of ideological conflict and division, that very great novelty is not exempt from preoccupying effects. At the same time, other signs recently come to the forefront, which are still rather difficult to interpret. One of the latest of these is the evocation of the hazy and ambiguous concept of a "new international order". 6/

6. The content of the present report has been conceived in the light of the indicated peculiarities of the subject-matter and of the perplexities and preoccupations that they suggest to us. Of course the main perplexities arise in the area of crimes. But is there such a clear and firm demarcation line between these and the most serious delicts? The main purpose of the present report is to identify problems, opinions and alternatives; and to elicit comment and criticism within the Commission and elsewhere on the basis of which more considerate suggestions and proposals could be submitted.

7. Considering the variety and the problematic character of the terms used to indicate the measures we are to deal with, the operative chapters of the present report are preceded by a preliminary Chapter on terminology. This will reduce the ambiguities that would derive from the variety of meanings attached to those terms in the literature as well as in the practice.

6/ The grave crisis in connection with which the "new international order" concept was evoked has also brought about interesting developments with regard to some of the consequences of that crisis which bear on State responsibility. We refer the reader to Document S/22559 of 2 May 1991.
Chapter I

Kinds of Measures to be Considered

8. International practice indicates a variety of measures to which States resort in order to secure fulfilment of the obligations deriving from the commission of an internationally wrongful act or otherwise react to the latter. Practice and doctrine classify such measures into separate categories according to factual and juridical affinities. One finds thus a variety of denominations some of which refer to one and the same concept while a number of them overlap in many ways and are differently understood depending on historical evolution and scholarly elaboration. The most widely used are self-defence (more or less distinguished from the wider concept of self-help), sanction, retorsion, reprisals, reciprocity, countermeasures, resolution and suspension of treaties, inadimplent non est adimplendum. In English one also speaks generally of unilateral remedies; in French of réactions décentralisées as opposed, presumably, to réactions centralisées.

A. Self-defence

9. Self-defence is perhaps one of the terms most frequently resorted to in the practice and deeply analysed in the literature, mainly in the light of the official positions taken by States and of the dicta of international bodies. However, for the purposes of the instrumental consequences of international delicts, it seems not necessary to deal in detail with all the complex legal problems involved in the notion of self-defence. Indeed, the Commission has pronounced itself on self-defence within the framework of draft

Article 34 of Part One of the project. 8/ Whatever our personal conviction on the choices then made regarding self-defence as a circumstance precluding wrongfulness, we deem it preferable, at least for the time being, not to abandon the meaning adopted within the said framework.

10. From the commentary to Article 34 it appears that self-defence has to be understood as "a reaction to ... a specific kind of internationally wrongful act", 9/ namely as a unilateral armed reaction against an armed attack. Such a reaction would consist in a "form of armed self-help or self-protection", 10/ exceptionally permitted by the "international legal order" - which nowadays "contemplate[s] a genuine and complete ban on the use of force" - in case of defence "against an armed attack by another subject in breach of the prohibition". 11/ In particular, the Commission, considering "that no codification taking place within the framework and under the auspices of the United Nations should be based on criteria which, from any standpoint whatsoever, do not fully accord with those underlying the Charter, especially when, as in the present case, the subject matter concerns so sensitive a domain as the maintenance of international peace and security", 12/ concluded that the typical legal meaning of such a notion, for the purposes of the project on State responsibility, can only be that to "suspend or negate altogether, in the particular instance concerned, the duty to observe ... the general obligation to refrain from the use or threat of force in international relations". 13/ In this way the "Commission intends ... to remain faithful to the content and scope of the pertinent rules of the UN Charter and to take them as a basis in formulating" draft Article 34. 14/

11. Even if the Commission did not want to take a stand "on the question of any total identity of content between the rule in Article 51 of the Charter and the customary rule of international law on self-defence", 15/ it is very

10/ Ibid., p. 54.

13/ Ibid., p. 60.

14/ Ibid., p. 59.

likely that such an identity exists, as has recently been asserted by the ICJ in a well-known judgment. 16/ Just as general (customary) international law included a prohibition of force as broad as that embodied in Article 2, paragraph 4 of the Charter, it also developed a régime of self-defence identical to the régime set forth in Article 51. There would thus be probably no room as a consequence of such a development, for any of those broader concepts of self-defence which a part of the doctrine - and of State practice itself - seem to assume to have survived the Charter (as an inherent customary right) on the basis of general international law. 17/ Although, as will be shown later on, the doctrine and practice based upon such a notion are surely not negligible, their legal merits will be discussed, except for the few general remarks set forth infra, paragraphs 98 amd 99 only in connection with the consequences of international crimes: such consequences to be treated at a later stage.

12. Moving from the concept of self-defence to the more general one of self-help, we do not believe that such a concept - avoided so far by the Commission - would be useful for the purposes of the present report. It could even be misleading. Of course, in a predominantly inorganic society, in which so much reliance must be placed upon the unilateral protection of their rights by single States or groups of States, the concept of self-help ultimately characterizes the whole range of inter-State relations. 18/ But the codification on State responsibility requires a precise and more discriminating terminology which permits to stress the differences in legal régime among the various forms of reaction to a wrongful act for the proper distinctions to be made between the lawful and unlawful forms of such reactions, and their specific features.

B. Sanctions

13. Problematic in the general theory of law, the concept of sanction is notoriously even more problematic in the literature and practice of international responsibility. The only clear point is that it deals with an essentially relative notion susceptible of a variety of definitions. We suggest, however, that we leave aside those broadest definitions under which one would label as a sanction any one of the consequences of an internationally wrongful act, including not only the measures by which States may secure cessation or reparation but the substantive right to obtain cessation and/or reparation as well.

14. A relatively recent authoritative work identifies international sanctions with the "consequences of an [internationally] wrongful act, unfavourable to the offender, provided by or admitted under international law". Within such a framework a "sanctioning action" would be "any conduct detrimental to the interests of the offending State, apt to pursue reparatory, punitive, possibly preventive purposes and either provided for or simply not prohibited by international law". 12/ Thus understood, sanction would seem to cover not only such measures as retorsions and reprisals - inclusive in their turn of the so-called "reciprocity" (infra, paras. 28-32) - but self-defence as well. Other recent scholarly elaborations submit that the above definition is acceptable except in the measure in which it extends the concept to actions in self-defence. Such actions would not really be sanctions for the same reasons that distinguish them from reprisals. 20/

15. A more specific, circumscribed meaning of sanctions seems, however, to prevail in the contemporary doctrine 21/ and to find some support in the work of the Commission itself. In particular, by using in draft Article 30 of Part One the terms "measures" and "countermeasures" instead of the term "sanction" proposed by Ago to describe the so-called "unilateral", "horizontal" (State-to-State) forms of reaction to an unlawful act, the Commission reserves indeed the term sanction to measures adopted by an

12/ Our paraphrased translation from Forlati Picchio, L., La sanzione nel diritto internazionale, Padova 1974 p. 40. It is regrettable that this highly valuable work should not be available to scholars unable to understand the Italian language. A review in French has appeared in the RGDIP, 1978, (Rousseau), p. 557-558, one in English in Italian Yearbook of International Law, Vol. 1, 1975, pp. 377-79 (Ferrari Bravo), and one in German (Verdross, A.) in the Osterreichische Zeitschrift für öffentliches Recht, Vol. 28, 1977, pp. 374-375.

21/ De Guttry, A., La rappresaglie non comportanti la coercizione militare nel diritto internazionale, Milano, 1985, p. 36; Leben, C., "Les contre-mesures inter-étatiques et les réactions à l'illicite dans la société internationale", AFDI, Vol. 28, p. 19. Essentially on the same line seems to place himself Dupuy, P.M., "Observations sur la pratique récente des 'sanctions' de l'illicite", RGDIP, Vol. 87, 1983, p. 517. By using this term to indicate measures adopted by a number of States by way of reaction to (presumably) erga omnes violations, the latter author seems to differentiate such measures from ordinary "horizontal" reprisals and to place them closer to the "vertical" measures ("sanctions") provided for by international institutions. Similarly, Domincé, Ch., Observations sur les droits de l'Etat victime d'un fait internationalement illicite, in Droit International 2, Paris, 1982, p. 33; and the ILC debate on draft Article 30 of Part One: YBILC, 1979, Vol. I, 1544th Meeting.
international body. It referred notably to international measures adopted by such a body following a wrongful act "having serious consequences for the international community as a whole, in particular ... to the ... measures [adopted] by the United Nations under the system established by the Charter to maintain international peace and security". 22/ It is our submission that the rather low degree of "verticality" of the measures taken by international bodies might not really justify the abandonment of a concept which may still serve a useful purpose to describe the function of those strictly unilateral or "horizontal" State measures upon which the effectiveness of international law still so largely depends. 23/ We feel, however, that in conformity with the Commission's choice, the term sanction should better be reserved to designate the measures taken by international bodies. Only when we shall deal with the consequences of crimes, it might be worthwhile to see whether the term sanction could be extended to measures which, although emanating from States collectively, would not qualify as measures taken by an international body.

C. Retorsions

16. According to the majority of scholars this term would cover such reactions of a State to an unlawful, unfriendly act, as are themselves unfriendly but not unlawful 24/. In a partly different sense the term is used by Politis, 25/ Oppenheim, 26/ Morelli, 27/ Skubiszewski 28/ and

23/ Considering the very close relationship between the function of sanctions and the "effectiveness or even the existence of international law" and considering further the essentially inorganic structure of international society and the difficulty of distinguishing between "civil" and "penal" aspects of State responsibility, we believe that the concept is still indispensable - as well as the concept of reprisals - for the analytical study of international responsibility. See Combacau, J., "Sanctions", in Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. 9, 1986, p. 337; and Fartsch, K.J., "Reprisals" and "Retorsion", ibid., pp. 334-335, pp. 335-337.

Paniagua, \textsuperscript{22} who confine the term to unfriendly measures taken in response to equally unfriendly acts, thus excluding unfriendly measures taken in response to unlawful acts. One would thus leave outside of the concept (and possibly find no systematic place for) any unfriendly measures taken by way of reaction to an unlawful act. We deem it more practical for the present purposes to use the term retorsion or retaliation to indicate unfriendly but lawful action in response to a prior internationally wrongful act.

17. In describing retorsion some writers like to refer to the sphere of discretionary action pertaining to each State. \textsuperscript{30} Others prefer to speak, either of a sphere of non regulated conduct of States or of international \textit{comitas}. \textsuperscript{31} Others stress the existence in the habitual behaviour of States of a margin favourable to another State or its nationals. \textsuperscript{32} Such a margin would encompass measures of retorsion, that is, acts which deprive the allegedly responsible State of an advantage to which it had no proper right prior to the wrongful act. \textsuperscript{33}

18. Although acts of retorsion belong \textit{per se} to the sphere of permissible, lawful conduct, some authors wonder whether resort thereto is not subject to legal limitations. For instance, Schachter refers to the hypothesis where \textsuperscript{33} Zoller, E., Quelques réflexions sur les contre-mesures en Droit International Public, in Etudes Colliard, Paris 1984, p. 364. Adhering to the prevailing doctrine, our distinguished predecessor Riphagen includes the suspension of diplomatic relations among retorsions. In view of the inexistence, in his opinion, of any \textit{de lege lata} obligation in this respect, the suspension of diplomatic relations is neither an unlawful act nor a reprisal. The said measure could always be adopted in response to an internationally wrongful act (Fourth Report, YBILC, Vol. II, (Part One), 1983, para. 110, p. 20-21).

"an otherwise permissible action is taken for an illegal objective". 34/ De Guttry mentions the possible contradiction between acts of retorsion which may endanger "international peace and security, and justice" and the obligation to settle disputes by peaceful means as provided for in article 2, paragraph 3 of the Charter. 35/

19. If one accepts the notion of retorsion as covering acts not unlawful per se (albeit less than friendly), such a concept should not find a place within the framework of a codification of State responsibility. Although retorsions are and may be resorted to by way of reaction to an internationally wrongful act, they do not give rise to the legal problems which are typical of the other forms of reaction to be considered for the purposes of the draft Articles on State responsibility. Acts of retorsion may nevertheless call for some attention in view of the fact that international practice does not always show a clear distinction of measures consisting of violations of international obligations from measures which do not pass the threshold of unlawfulness.

D. Reprisals

20. Once self-defence, sanctions and retorsions were set aside, a further traditional concept to be considered - and the oldest and the most important one - is that of reprisals.

21. It is perhaps not useless to recall that the notion of reprisal originally indicated, in interindividual systems, the measures used directly by the aggrieved party as a means of securing direct reparation. During the Middle Ages a person who had suffered an injustice in a foreign country and was formally refused satisfaction by that country's sovereign, could turn to his own sovereign and request "lettres de marque". These "lettres de marque" contained an official authorization of the sovereign for the injured party to resort to reprisals against the property of the nationals of the foreign State present in his own country, or at sea. 36/ "Private reprisals" were later replaced by "public" or "general reprisals", only "nations" being entitled to resort to them. 37/ De Vattel described reprisals as follows: "Reprisals are used between nation and nation, in order to do themselves justice when they cannot otherwise obtain it. If a nation has taken possession of what belongs to another - if she refuses to pay a debt, to repair an injury, or to give adequate satisfaction for it - if she refuses to pay a debt, to repair an injury, or to give adequate satisfaction for it - the latter may seize something belonging to the former, and apply it to her own advantage till she obtains payment of what is due to her, together with interest and damages - or keep it as a pledge till she has received ample satisfaction.". 38/

22. Most modern authors see a reprisal as a conduct which, "per se unlawful in as much as it would entail the violation of the right of another subject, loses its unlawful character by virtue of being a reaction to a wrongful act committed by that other subject". 39/ Anzilotti defined reprisals as "actes objectivement illícites par lesquels un État réagit contre le tort à lui fait par un autre État". 40/ A less concise definition was adopted in 1934 by the International Law Institute, whereby reprisals are "des mesures de contrainte dérogatoires aux règles ordinaires du droit des gens, prises par un État à la suite d'acte illicite commis à son préjudice par un autre État et ayant pour but d'imposer à celui-ci, au moyen d'un dommage, le respect du droit". 41/

23. In the contemporary literature a narrow concept of reprisal is proposed by some authors, whereby the concept would exclude measures of reciprocity. The term reprisal would thus only cover such reactions to a wrongful act as violate a different norm to that violated by the wrongful act itself: "While reciprocity gives rise to non-performance of an obligation similar (by identity or by equivalence) to the violated obligation, reprisals consist in the non-performance of a different rule". 42/ But we shall revert to reciprocity in due course. 43/

24. According to a widely shared view the term reprisal would apply preferably to the measures adopted by way of reaction to an internationally wrongful act by an injured party against the offending State ("horizontal" measures), whereas the term "sanction" would more properly apply, as recalled earlier, to the measures taken against the wrongdoing State by an international body (so-called "vertical" measures).

25. Considering the pretty clear connotation that the term reprisal has acquired in the practice and doctrine of unilateral State reactions to internationally wrongful acts, it is our belief that most such reactions - in so far as they do not qualify as retorsions or self-defence - are properly covered, in principle, by that classic term. The reasons which may make other terms preferable, are either the greater generality of the latter (such being particularly the case of "measures" or "countermeasures") or the frequent association of acts of reprisal with the notion of measures involving the use of force. 44/

E. Countermeasures

26. As noted in our Preliminary Report, the term "countermeasures" is a newcomer in the terminology of the consequences of an internationally wrongful act. 45/ Significant examples are in the Air Services, United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran and Military and Paramilitary Activities in and Against Nicaragua decisions. 46/ Article 30 of Part One of the draft Articles, as adopted on first reading, uses the term "measure" in the text and "countermeasures" in the title.

27. Although divergent views are expressed in the literature with regard to both the degree of propriety of the term countermeasures and the kinds of measures it covers, 47/ writers seem generally inclined to consider the concept as the most suitable to embrace the generality of the measures that may be resorted to in order to seek cessation or redress. 48/ A number of

44/ On this last aspect, see Dominicé, op. cit., p. 33.

47/ Elagab, for instance, The Legality of Non-Forcible Countermeasures in International Law, Oxford, 1988, p. 4, seems to exclude "forcible" reprisals; Zoller seems to consider the term to cover all non-armed measures and suspension of treaties, leaving out reciprocity and treaty termination. In her view, an essential feature of countermeasures would be their coercive purpose: such a purpose being present only where the reaction goes beyond the limit of "identity/equivalence" (reciprocity) and excluded in case of adoption of such a definitive measure as termination of the treaty, Peacetime, op. cit., p. 75; the Restatement of Law Third uses the term countermeasures in Article 905 covering "Unilateral Remedies". According to the "Comment" countermeasures are "measures that would be unlawful where they are not in response to a violation" and include: "suspension or termination of treaty relations generally or of a particular international agreement or provision; freezing of assets of the offending State; imposition of other economic sanctions", Restatement, op. cit., pp. 380-381.

48/ See, inter alios, Reuter, P., Droit international, op. cit., p. 465, and Dupuy, P.M., op. cit., p. 527.
authors note that the Commission itself understood the term in question, as used in draft Article 30 of Part One of the Draft, as inclusive of the measures traditionally classified as reprisals as well as the "sanctions" decided upon or applied by international bodies. 49/ Although we do not see any obstacle to such a broad interpretation of the term as used in the cited draft Article, we shall use it (here and in further developments on the consequences of delicts) to indicate essentially the so-called unilateral or "horizontal" reactions of one or more States to an internationally wrongful act, to the exclusion of self-defence and retorsions. Letting aside for the time being, the choice of the term or terms which will appear to be most suitable for the single draft Articles by which to cover the relevant aspects of what we refer to as the instrumental consequences of internationally wrongful acts, it can be said that the term countermeasures seems to present itself (despite our initial reservations) as the most neutral and as such the most comprehensive of the various kinds of measures injured States may be lawfully entitled to take severally or jointly against the author State or States. This would be without prejudice, for the time being, to any subdivisions which may appear to be appropriate to ourselves or, mainly, to the Commission.

F. Reciprocity measures

28. The main issue here is whether a distinction may be justified and practically useful between reprisals (or the countermeasures so qualified) on the one hand and the measures taken, so to speak, by way of mere reciprocity, on the other hand.

29. It is well-known that the concept (as well as "principle") of reciprocity applies in various areas of international law and relations. "La reciprocité exprime l'idée d'un retour, d'un lien entre ce qui est donné de part et d'autre. De ce lien peuvent être tirées un certain nombre de conséquences juridiques, en ce qui concerne notamment l'exigibilité des engagements échangés. En comprenant plus largement encore cette idée de retour, pour justifier toute symétrie des attitudes, on trouve la reciprocité à la base de la rétorsion et des représailles". 50/ Moving from such a very broad meaning, a number of authors use the term reciprocity to indicate a certain kind of unilateral reaction to an internationally wrongful act. According to our distinguished predecessor, for example, "[r]eciprocité meant action consisting of non-performance by the injured State of obligations under the same rule as that breached by the internationally wrongful act, or a rule directly connected therewith". 51/

30. More articulately other writers identify two possible kinds of reciprocity. One is reciprocity "by identity" ("par identité") in the case where a reaction takes place under "conditions which are exactly the same for both parties". The other is reciprocity "by equivalence" ("par equivalent") in the case where "identity of conditions cannot be insured", i.e. when the States "are not bound by the same obligations". 52/ In the latter case, reciprocity will take the form of non-performance of the counterpart's quid pro quo obligation (namely, of what Forlati calls "prestazione corrispettiva") or of the non-performance of an obligation of "equal value or equal meaning" (as Zoller calls) of the infringed reciprocal obligation.

31. Now, while most writers do not believe that "reciprocity by equivalent" corresponds to a kind of measures distinct from reprisals – or, more generally, countermeasures – a few authors seem to maintain that the former are distinct and should as such be subject to a different legal régime. 53/ Our predecessor Riphagen, for his part, while dealing with reciprocity measures within the general framework of countermeasures does make them the object of a provision separate from the draft Article dealing with reprisals. The distinction would be necessary, in his view, because measures by way of reciprocity would be intended to restore the balance between the position of the offending State and that of the injured party, while reprisals would be intended instead to "put pressure" on the offending State in order to secure compliance with the new obligation arising from the wrongful act. As for the conceptual basis of reciprocity measures, Riphagen finds it in the existence of the synallagmatic relationship or "échange de prestations" which is the object and raison d'être of the infringed norm. Reciprocity would thus be achieved through the suspension, on the part of the injured State, of compliance with the obligations corresponding to those violated by the offending State. Reprisals, on the contrary, would presuppose the inexistence of a legal link between the infringed obligation and the obligations the performance of which is suspended by the injured State. 54/

52/ Zoller, E., Peacetime, op. cit., p. 19-20; Virally, M., op. cit., p. 22ff.; and Forlati Picchio, who speaks of "sospensione della prestazione reciproca" with regard to réciprocité par identité and "sospensione della prestazione corrispettiva" with regard to réciprocité par équivalent (La sanzione, op. cit., p. 93, note 116).

53/ Zoller, Quelques réflexions, op. cit., p. 364.

32. The question should be settled by an accurate study of practice. The practice of States should notably tell us whether the reactions qualified as "reciprocity measures" are or should be subjected to conditions, limitations or other requirements different from those obtaining for reprisals or countermeasures in general or whether any special features the said reciprocity measures may present are simply justified by a more articulate application of the very same principles governing reprisals or countermeasures in general.

G. Inadimplenti non est adimplendum. Suspension and Termination of Treaties.

33. An analogous question arises with regard to the measures commonly referred to by the maxim inadimplenti non est adimplendum and for the suspension and termination of treaties. It is known that, although the tenet inadimplenti non est adimplendum would seem literally to be applicable to non-compliance with any international obligation, irrespective of its conventional or customary origin, it is traditionally used to indicate the so-called reciprocity measures within a treaty context. 55/

55/ Significant, in this respect, is the statement contained in the United States Memorial presented to the Arbitral Tribunal in the Air Services Case: "International law recognizes that a party to an agreement which is breached by the other party may reciprocally suspend proportional obligations under the agreement. Available countermeasures range from formal termination of an agreement in the event of a material breach, to an interim withdrawal of corresponding rights of the other party while other rights and obligations remain in effect. As the International Law Commission has stated, a violation of a treaty obligation, as of any other obligation, may give rise to a right in the other party to take nonforcible reprisals, and these reprisals may properly relate to the defaulting party's rights under the treaty. This generally recognized principle serves as one of the most important sanctions behind international law - namely reciprocity. No State can validly claim from other States, as a matter of binding obligation, conduct which it is not prepared to regard as binding upon itself. This right to take proportional countermeasures has been specifically affirmed in the context of bilateral international aviation agreements. In his comprehensive treatise, The Law of International Air Transport at 482, Bin Cheng focuses specifically on this question in the context of the Bermuda-type bilateral air transport agreements and the practice of the United Kingdom. He concludes that: "When in the opinion of one of the parties (to a Bermuda-type agreement) the other contracting party has committed a breach of an agreement [...] the principle inadimplenti non est adimplendum applies and the party aggrieved is entitled to take proportionate retaliatory measures" (in Digest of United States Practice in International Law 1978, pp. 769-770, pp. 37-41 of the United States Memorial). Numerous writers use indistinctly, at the side of inadimplenti non est adimplendum the expression exceptio inadimpleti contractus. A different view seems to be held by Zoller, who refers to exceptio inadimpleti contractus only with respect to treaty obligations and sees the other maxim (inadimplenti non est adimplendum) as just another way of expressing the principle of reciprocity, regardless of the source (custom or treaty) of the obligations in question (Peacetime, op. cit., p. 15 and Quelques réflexions, op. cit., p. 364). See also Reuter, op. cit., p. 464; and Politis, (Ann. IDI, 1934, Vol. 38, op. cit., p. 10) who believed that
34. By suspension and termination of treaties one refers instead, of course, to the particular consequences of non-compliance with treaty obligations codified in Article 60 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. Part of the doctrine considers both these consequences as inadimplenti non est adimplendum corollaries. This part of the doctrine believes that reciprocity manifests itself when unlawful action and reaction both find their place within the context of the treaty, non-compliance with which would (in given circumstances) justify it. As noted in paragraphs 31 and 33 above with regard to the relationship between reprisals and reciprocity, one finds, here again, essentially – except for minor, although by no means negligible, peculiar features – just a species of reprisals. 56/ Another part of the literature, while admitting that suspension and termination of treaties are applications of the principle inadimplenti non est adimplendum, stresses instead the autonomy of suspension and termination within or without the framework of Article 60 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. 57/ The autonomy of suspension and termination from reprisals would be justified by differences relating, inter alia: – to the purpose of the measures, considered to be aimed at securing reparation directly instead of merely coercing the wrongdoer to provide therefor; – to the object, which in the case of suspension or termination would be confined to responding to non-compliance with a treaty obligation; – to the regulation of procedural conditions, which is more detailed.

exceptio inadimpleti contractus indicated within a treaty context, the refusal of a State to comply with an obligation by reason of the non compliance with the correlative (synallagmatic) obligation of the other party: a refusal which would have been not a reprisal but a lawful way of terminating conventional obligations.

57/ An original position is taken by Zoller. According to her the fact that suspension and termination – as forms of reaction to a wrongful act – do not present such features as identity and equivalence, places them outside of the ambit of reciprocity proper. In the cited author's opinion, among measures resorted to by way of reaction to non-compliance with a treaty, one distinguishes inadimplenti non est adimplendum (reciprocity) from suspension and termination. The former kind of reaction (reciprocity) would consist in the mere non-compliance with an obligation deriving from the treaty. Suspension and termination, instead, would consist in the obliteration – definitive or temporary – of the very legal existence of the treaty obligation involved (Zoller, E., Peacetime, op. cit., p. 28). On the said distinction, see, furthermore, Simma, Reflections on Article 60 of the Vienna Convention, in ÖZöR, Vol. 20, 1970, pp. 5-83; Forlati Picchio, L., Le Sanzione, op. cit., pp. 76-81; and Politis in Ann. IDI, op. cit., p. 60.
35. The problem involved here is to see whether practice may justify a distinction of such "conventional" measures as treaty suspension and termination from countermeasures in general not only for merely descriptive reasons but in view of the legal régime to be codified or otherwise adopted by way of progressive development. As well as the question of the so-called "reciprocity measures" in general, the issues relating to these two "conventional" measures - issues connected with the relationship between the law of treaties and the law of State responsibility - will have to be the object of further study before any draft Articles are formulated.

H. Object of the following chapters

36. The following Chapters are devoted to the identification, also in the light of the most authoritative and recent literature, of the various problems of the legal régime of the countermeasures to which States may resort as a consequence of internationally wrongful acts (including reprisals, reciprocity measures, inadimplenti non est adimplendum, suspension and termination of treaties). With regard to each set of problems we shall try to envisage, with the help of the literature, the possible directions in which the codification and development of that régime could proceed. This with a view to soliciting comment and advice from our colleagues in the Commission and possibly from the Members of the Sixth Committee.
Chapter II
An Internationally Wrongful Act as a Precondition

37. While most writers believe, on the basis of well-known jurisprudential dicta, that a lawful resort to countermeasures presupposes an internationally unlawful conduct of an instant or continuing character, 58/ a few scholars seem to believe that resort to measures could be justified even in the presence of a good faith conviction, on the part of the acting State, that it has been or is being injured by an internationally wrongful act. 59/

38. Confronted with the alternatives of "necessity of a wrongful act" and "sufficiency of the injured State's good faith belief" or the mere allegation that a wrongful act has been committed, we would be inclined to think that the 58/ An exemplary definition of this requirement is the well-known Nauilaa case: "La première condition - sine qua non - du droit d'exercer de répresailles est un motif fourni par un act préalable, contraire au droit des gens" (Unriaa, vol. II, p. 1027). The same Tribunal in the Cysne case emphasized: "There is no legal justification for reprisals except when they have been provoked by an act contrary to international law", Ann. Dig. of Public International Law Cases, 1929-30, p. 490. It is significant that on the occasion of the 1930 Hague Codification Conference the question "What are the conditions which must be fulfilled when the State claims to have acted in circumstances which justified a policy of reprisals?" was met by all the answering States with the indication that a prior wrongful act was an indispensable prerequisite, League of Nations, Conference for the Codification of International Law: Bases of discussion, vol. III, 1929, pp. 128-130). In the same sense, see also, Article 1 of the IDI Resolution of 1934 (Ann. IDI, Vol. 38, 1934, p. 163), and draft Article 30 of Part One of the project on State Responsibility (YBILC 1979, Vol. II, (Part Two), p. 115).

59/ This seems to be the opinion, for example, of the arbitral tribunal in the Air Services Case where the arbitrators affirmed that it was: "quite obvious that the lawfulness of the action must be considered regardless of the answer to the question of substance concerning the alleged violation", ILR, Vol. 54, pp. 319 ff, notably para. 74. This understanding is confirmed by the fact that in the same case, as noted approvingly by Fisler Damrosch, "the Tribunal consistently refers to the 'alleged breach' or 'alleged violation' as giving rise to the other party's right to take responsive action" ("Retaliation or arbitration - or both? The 1978 U.S. - France aviation dispute", in AJIL, 1980, p. 796). A similar view is expressed by Dominice, who deems it unrealistic to require certainty as to the existence of a prior violation and concludes that reprisals are measures intended to react "à un manquement, réel ou allégué" (Dominice, Ch., op. cit., pp. 40-41). Also Fenwick speaks of reprisals or measures in reaction to "alleged illegal acts" ("International Law", IV ed., New York 1965, pp. 636-637).
prerequisite for a lawful resort to measures ought to be the first one. However, we do not think that this problem is of any real relevance for the present purposes. While it is indeed an essential one in order to determine whether a cause of exclusion of wrongfulness does come into play under draft Article 30 of Part One of the project as a justification for countermeasures, the determination of the prior commission of an internationally wrongful act is simply a necessary assumption from the viewpoint of the regulation of the contents, forms and degrees of responsibility. It is obvious, in other words, that the lawfulness of any one of the measures with the legal régime of which the Commission is to deal in the Second Part of the project necessarily presupposes the existence of that condition of a prior unlawful act which is governed by Part One.

Chapter III

Functions of Measures and Aims Pursued

39. Of not little relevance, albeit controversial, is the question of the functions and purposes of measures. In the literature, the variety of opinions on the subject is determined in a considerable part by the general concepts of international responsibility each scholar assumes as a starting point. 61/

40. In the less recent doctrine, the writers who start from the concept of an internationally wrongful act as a sort of, so to speak, predominantly "civil" nature, are inclined to see reprisals as instruments for the pursuit of an essentially restitutive/compensatory end. 62/ Those who conceive internationally wrongful acts as delicts of a predominantly "penal" or criminal nature assign to reprisals an afflictive, punitive or retributive function. 63/ The International Law Institute's 1934 Resolution expresses itself on this aspect by stating that reprisals are measures "ayant pour but d'imposer à (l'Etat qui a commis l'acte illicite), au moyen d'un dommage, le respect du droit." In this definition two features are of significance from the present point of view. One is the verb "imposer", indicating the coercive role the injured State performs - in either direction - within the essentially "horizontal" legal relationship in which international responsibility obviously consists. The other feature are the terms "dommage" and "respect du droit", which seem to emphasize, at the side of the reparatory function implied in respect du droit, the idea of retribution, implicit both in "dommage" and "respect du droit". The Institut would thus seem to place itself on an ambivalent position. More specifically to a mainly compensatory concept of measures seems to adhere Oppenheim, when he stresses the "compulsive", together with an essentially reparatory role of reprisals. 64/

61/ See on the whole matter of the purposes of reprisals, Sicilianos, op. cit., pp. 49-69.

62/ See, for example, Anzilotti, D., op. cit., pp. 165-167, to be read in the light of the well-known remarks in Teoria generale della responsabilità dello Stato nel Diritto Internazionale, Firenze, 1902, pp. 95-96. In analogous sense see also, De La Brière, Y., op. cit., p. 241; Bourquin, M., "Règles générales du droit de la paix", Hague Rec., Vol. 35, 1931 I, p. 222; and the accurate remarks by Politis, op. cit., pp. 28-29, in his IDI Report, in which the reparatory nature of reprisals is confirmed by his observation that the right to act in reprisal begins only after the State author of the wrongful act refuses reparation and ceases at the moment in which reparation is obtained.

63/ See, for example, Kelsen, H., "Unrecht und Unrechtsfolge im Völkerrecht", in Zör, Vol. 12, 1932, pp. 571 ff.

41. In the post-Second World War literature the doctrinal debate is characterized by the position of those who see in reprisals a measure exclusively instrumental to cessation and reparation, on one side, and those who believe that reprisals are instrumental to both reparation and retribution (punishment), on the other side. The first tendency is represented, inter alios, by Skubiszewski, Venezia, Lamberti Zanardi, Zourek, Brownlie, Dupuy, Paniagua, Zemanek and the American Law Institute's Restatement of Law Third.

42. The eclectic or "dual" concept (with some emphasis upon the retributive role) seems to be preferred instead by Forlati Picchio, Lattanzi, and, perhaps in a more nuanced form, by Morelli and Ago. According to the latter's position expressed in his Eighth Report "[t]he peculiarity of a sanction is that its object is essentially punitive or repressive; this punitive purpose may in its turn be exclusive and as such represent an objective per se, or else it may be accompanied by the intention to give a warning against a possible repetition of conduct like that which is being punished, or again it might constitute a means of exerting pressure in order

70/ Dupuy, P.M., op. cit., p. 530.

71/ Paniagua, op. cit., p. 158.

73/ According to the Restatement the emphasis would seem to be placed on cessation/reparation: "The principle of necessity ordinarily precludes measures designed only as retribution for a violation and not as an incentive to terminate a violation or to remedy it". Restatement Third, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 382.

76/ Morelli, G., op. cit., p. 363.
to obtain compensation for a prejudice suffered". 77/ While placing themselves within the same trend, Sereni, Cassese and Conforti do not seem to stress any one of the concurring functions. Bowett, for his part, while recognizing the punitive function of reprisals, specifies that they serve "to impose reparation for the harm done, or to compel a satisfactory settlement of the dispute created by the initial illegal act, or to compel the delinquent State to abide by the law in the future". 78/

43. The study of the function of measures (and the aims pursued or pursuable by the injured State thereby) is the object of more particular care in some recent works on reprisals. In some of these works a marked predominance is assigned to coercion for restitutive/reparatory purposes. 79/ Zoller, for example, believes that "peacetime unilateral remedies" perform "three distinct purposes": 'reparation', 'coercion', 'punishment'; and assigns to 'countermeasures' exclusively the second of these purposes, namely 'coercion'. 80/ Elagab identifies the functions of reprisals in "self-protection", "reciprocity", and inducement to "an expeditious settlement of a dispute". Unlike Zoller and others he - as well as Lamberti Zanardi 81/ - do not seem to exclude an "executive" function, namely the use of reprisals by the injured State in order to secure reparation directly. 82/

77/ Eighth Report, Addendum, op. cit., para. 90.
78/ Bowett, D., op. cit., AJIL 1972, p. 3.
79/ De Guttry, A., for example, defines reprisals as "a form of pressure" aimed at securing that the offending State "modify its conduct in order to comply with its international obligations" (op. cit., p. 12). Reprisals would thus not perform a directly executive but an "indirect self-help" function by applying a kind of instrumental coercion in order to induce the offending State to comply with its obligations: - an aim which would include cessation as well as reparation (op. cit., pp. 29 and 150). A coercive rather than "executive" function is identified by Kalshoven, F., op. cit., p. 26; Paniagua, op. cit., p. 158; Zemanek, op. ult. cit., p. 35.
80/ Zoller, E., op. cit., pp. 46 ff. As well as the previously cited writers, Zoller (who addressed herself to the suspension of treaties as well as reprisals) believes that countermeasures are neither punitive-repressive nor directly reparatory (compensatory) or executive but exclusively coercive-reparatory in a broad sense. This would necessarily imply a temporary character of the measures which should cease to operate once their purpose has been attained. Zoller, E., op. cit., p. 54. Similarly De Guttry, A., op. cit., pp. 266-268. Two authors who, in less recent times, particularly insisted on temporality as a condition for the legitimacy of measures adopted by way of reprisal are Strupp, K., op. cit., p. 568; and De La Brière, Y., op. cit., p. 271.
81/ Lamberti Zanardi, op cit., p. 312.
44. While recognizing the diversity of purposes pursued by reprisals, Dominié 83/ notes that "La doctrine des représailles a été marquée par l'idée qu'il s'agit d'un acte de vengeance, d'un châtiment, ce qu'elles furent sans doute autrefois. L'institution n'a pas entièrement perdu ce caractère, mais ce n'est plus son trait dominant. Elle doit être comprise dans le contexte de l'autoprotection et à la lumière de sa finalité première qui est la contrainte". 84/ The cited author holds however a very elastic concept of the functions of reprisals, such functions varying according to the circumstances, notably to the timing of the injured State's reaction and the attitude of the offending State. Thus, if the injured State reacts to a continuing violation, the measure's function will be to put a stop to the wrongful conduct and revert to compliance with the infringed obligation in which case the measure will be of a temporary, provisional character. 85/ If one reacts instead to a refusal to make reparation, the reprisal will have an executive or punitive purpose — and will acquire a final or definitive character. As regards their interaction with dispute settlement procedures, Dominié seems to believe that reprisals may be aimed — depending on the phase in which the settlement commitments come into play — either at inducing implementation of the settlement procedure or at preserving, by interim measures, the chances to obtain the reparation provided for by the settlement which will eventually be achieved through the procedure resorted to.

45. In the presence of the distinctions proposed in the literature it will be necessary to analyse State practice in extent and depth. One must try to see whether and in what measure the legal régime of countermeasures is or should be diversified according to the function they may be intended to perform. It is perhaps likely — subject, however, to verification — that a diversification may appear to be particularly justified with regard to the impact of the prior claim to reparation, sommation, compliance with peaceful settlement obligations and proportionality.

83/ Dominié, Ch., op. cit., pp. 34-35. For a similar approach, see Gianelli, A., op cit., p. 42. The indication of at least three different purposes of countermeasures (coercive, conservative/cautionary, executive) appears to be present also in Riphagen's Fourth Report, YBILC, Vol. II (Part One), 1983, paras. 102-106, pp. 20-21.

Chapter IV

The Issue of a Prior Claim of Reparation

46. Frequently evoked but rarely dealt with adequately is the question whether and to what extent lawful resort to reprisals should be preceded by intimations such as protest, demand of cessation and/or reparation, sommation or any other form of communication to the offending State on the part of the aggrieved State or States. Nevertheless, two main trends can be discerned, both related to the general theories on international responsibility.

47. The minority doctrine according to which reprisals are the primary and normal sanction of any internationally wrongful act — reparation being, in a sense, just a possible "secondary" consequence — seems to maintain, although not without exception, that lawful resort to reprisal is not subject to any intimation, claim or sommation of the kind indicated in the preceding paragraph. No demand of cessation or reparation would need to be addressed as a matter of law to the offending State before reprisals are put into effect.

48. A different position is clearly taken by the classical theory of State responsibility by which reparation and cessation are seen as the principal consequences of an internationally wrongful act while reprisals are seen essentially (although not exclusively) as coercive means to obtain cessation and/or reparation. Under this theory it is therefore natural to assume 86/ A valuable doctoral thesis on the subject has been presented in Rome University by Gianelli, A., under the title Adempimenti preventivi al ricorso a misure di reazione all'illecito internazionale, Rome University, 1990. The manuscript has been kindly made available to us by the author.

88/ Kelsen, H., Unrecht op. cit., pp. 571 ff. This not so recent theory held that since a demand for reparation or an injunction would even not be necessary in the most extreme cases, namely when the injured State decided to resort to war, this would a fortiori hold true in case of measures short of war. While adhering to Kelsen's theory, Guggenheim has subsequently maintained that the injured State would be under the obligation to "mettre le violateur en demeure avant de proceder à des représailles", Traité de Droit International, II, Genève, 1954, p. 64, note 2 and p. 85 note 5.

that acts of reprisals cannot, as a rule, be lawfully resorted to prior to an unsuccessful protest and demand for cessation and/or reparation. 90/

49. The essence of the latter position is also maintained by that part of the doctrine which professes a broader concept of both the substantive and the instrumental consequences of an internationally wrongful act. We refer to the doctrine according to which the consequences of an internationally wrongful act are not merely restitutive, compensatory or reparatory but retributive or punitive as well. The authors who so define the said consequences also share the classical view that whatever their function (compensatory, retributive or dual), reprisals may not lawfully be resorted to unless cessation/reparation has been demanded without success. 91/

50. The contemporary doctrine elaborates of course in different ways on the general trend, especially with regard to the conditions under which the said principle applies and with regard to the admissible exceptions. Wengler, for example, thinks that the aggrieved State could lawfully resort to reprisals without any preliminaries in case of dolus on the part of the law-breaking State. 92/ The view has also been expressed that no preliminaries are required for measures to be taken against a State responsible of an international crime. 93/ Others indicate an exception in the case of...

II, 7th ed., 1952, pp. 136 and 218; Ago, R., "Le délit international", Hague Rec., 1939-II, pp. 527 ff.; Morelli, G., Nozioni op. cit., p. 363; Cepelka, Les conséquences juridiques du délit en droit international contemporain, Prague 1965, pp. 42 ff.; Skubiszewski, K.J., op. cit., p. 753; Schachter, O., op. cit., p. 170. One could not neglect the conclusions recently reached, on the present matter, by the American Law Institute in its Restatement of the Law Third of 14 May 1986. The comment to paragraph 905, devoted to "unilateral remedies" states: "Counter-measures in response to a violation of an international obligation are ordinarily justified only when the accused State wholly denies the violation or its responsibilities for the violation; rejects or ignores requests to terminate the violation or pay compensation; or rejects or ignores proposals for negotiations or third-party resolution" (Restatement Third, op. cit., p. 381).

an internationally wrongful act of a "continuing character" (draft Article 25 of Part One of the draft Articles), 94/ or in the case of economic measures. 95/ With regard to the latter it is assumed, presumably, that no preliminaries need to be complied with in case of such (supposedly milder) forms of coercion. The rules proposed by our predecessor professor Riphagen, envisage a special régime for the case of synallagmatic obligations. Articles 8 and 10, in fact, do not even envisage an obligation of prior resort to (available) settlement procedures in the case where the injured State resorts to a non-compliance measure "by way of reciprocity" instead of "[by way of] reprisal". 96/ More systematically it has been suggested, in a recent contribution to the subject, that the question whether "a prior demand is a condition of lawful resort to reprisal depends upon the concrete circumstances of the violation and the nature of the obligation breached". 97/ The injured State would be relieved from the duty in question, for example, whenever the measure resorted to consisted in an application of the inadimplenti non est adimplendum principle and were taken by way of reaction to particularly serious violations. 98/

51. International practice should advise us more reliably with regard to the effective juridical relevance of a prior demand of reparation. Only on such a basis would it be possible to see how far a provision making of such a demand a condition of lawful resort to any measures would be a matter of mere codification or a matter of desirable progressive development. The study of practice should in particular tell us more than seems to emerge from the literature with regard to the frequently mentioned sommation: namely, whether this is a condition sine qua non of any measure, or a requirement of resort to given kinds of measures, the lawfulness of other kinds of reactions being subject to less strict conditions. In particular, one might hopefully draw from the said analysis less vague indications with regard to the identification of the measures the nature of which would exempt the injured State from the requirement of sommation. One might be in a position better to determine whether sommation should be not required for any relatively "bland" measures in general or the so-called "reciprocity" measures, or only for measures intended to perform an interim protective function; or whether the question would totally or partly depend upon the degree of urgency of the remedy or upon the gravity of the wrongful act. Were the practice to indicate that this area is not covered satisfactorily de lege lata, improvement might have to be sought, especially in order better to protect prospective weaker parties, as a matter of progressive development.

Chapter V

The Impact of Dispute Settlement Obligations

52. Interrelated with the requirement of a prior demand of reparation (sommation) is the question of the impact of any existing obligations of the injured State with regard to dispute settlement procedures. In some measure, indeed, the existence of any such obligations - and the injured State's prior compliance therewith - is quite likely to condition the lawfulness of resort to any unilateral remedies or given kinds thereof. A legal duty of the said State to resort to given means of settlement would then operate as another limitation of its faculté to resort to unilateral measures: and the recognition of such a restriction - de lege lata or de lege ferenda - would be a not negligible step towards the reduction of the undesirable consequences of the unilateral determination and enforcement of the right to reparation in a broad sense in such an inorganic milieu as the "society of States". Of course, the attempts in that direction have primarily been aimed so far at the objective of curbing arbitrary resort to armed force, whether for the implementation of alleged rights (legal disputes) or of mere interests (political disputes). Nevertheless, the matter has been rightly recognized to be of great importance for the legal control of resort to non-forcible measures as well. Although less dramatic and harmful, such measures can be equally detrimental to the preservation of friendly relations and the development of cooperation among States.

53. It is of course unnecessary to recall here the various steps of the development of peaceful settlement procedures which has led to the present, relatively more advanced stage of this vital chapter of international law. Suffice it to recall that the most important general step - probably embodied by now in a rule of general international law - is represented by the principle embodied in Article 2, paragraph 3 (obviously interrelated with Article 2, paragraph 4) of the United Nations Charter and by the more specific but still very general provisions of Article 33 of that same instrument. It is mainly on those provisions, obviously combined with the concrete settlement obligations deriving from bilateral or multilateral commitments of a more specific nature (only the most advanced of which are those deriving from the Statute of the ICJ and the various instruments connected with Article 36 thereof), that are based such important reiterations of the Charter rules as the not very satisfactory Friendly Relations formulation of the principle of peaceful settlement and the less disappointing, although very general, Manila Declaration.

54. A part of the doctrine is inclined to believe that the cited Charter principles and rules (as presumably reflected in general international law) make it unlawful for any injured State to resort to countermeasures prior to:

(i) the presentation of appropriate demands to the allegedly law-breaking State, as considered above; and
(ii) the bona fide experiment of the peaceful settlement procedures indicated in Article 33 of the Charter. 22/

Another part of the doctrine understands instead the second of the above requirements as applying only to measures involving force. This in view of the fact that only this kind of measures would be susceptible of endangering international peace and security. 100/ Measures short of force (force being mostly understood as military force) could thus lawfully be resorted to even without a prior compliance with the said requirement.

55. Be it as it may of the impact of the general rules on peaceful settlement, the question becomes more complex in the presence of dispute settlement obligations which may exist between injured State and law-breaking State by virtue of subjectively and objectively specific instruments (bilateral or multilateral, inorganic or institutional) to which the said States may be parties at the relevant time. We refer not only to the dispute settlement obligations and rights arising from instruments like special agreements (compromis), compromissory clauses, general arbitration or judicial settlement treaties or declarations of acceptance of the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice under the so-called optional clause (Article 36, paragraph 2 of the Court's Statute) but also to the statutes of a number of international institutions and to the multilateral instruments covering specific areas. A number of authors believe that at least the commitments deriving from such more specific instruments do have a decisive impact — under given conditions — on the lawfulness of measures to be taken. In given hypotheses, in other words, the prior experiment of one or more of the envisaged procedures would be a condition of lawful resort to measures. 101/

99/ Opinions anticipating this view had already been expressed by a number of participants in the travaux préparatoires of the cited IDI 1934 resolution, among them Politis, Barclay, and De La Brière (Ann. IDI, Vol. 38, 1934, pp. 40-41, 90, 95). In the more recent literature, see Zourek, La notion, op. cit., p. 60; Bowett, "Economic Coercion and Reprisals by States", in Virg. J.I.L. 1972, Vol. 13 (I), p. 10; Cassese, Il diritto internazionale nel mondo contemporaneo, Bologna, 1984, p. 270; Pueyo Losa, op. cit., p. 21; De Guttry, op. cit., pp. 227-237.

56. Less restrictive of the injured State's discretionary choice seems to be Article 5 of the resolution of the International Law Institute of 1934 according to which "Les représailles même non armées sont interdites quand le respect du droit peut être effectivement assuré par des procédures de règlement pacifique. En conséquence, elles doivent être considérées comme interdites notamment: (1) Lorsqu'en vertu du droit en vigueur entre les parties, l'acte dénoncé comme illicite est de la compétence obligatoire de juges ou d'arbitres ayant compétence aussi pour ordonner, avec la diligence voulue, des mesures provisoires ou conservatoires et que l'État défendeur ne cherche pas à écluser cette juridiction ou à en retarder le fonctionnement; (2) Lorsqu'une procédure de règlement pacifique est en cours, dans les conditions envisagées au (1), à moins que les représailles n'aient légitimement été prises auparavant, réserve faite de leur cessation décidée par l'autorité saisie". 102/ The condition that the legally available procedure be of such nature as effectively to ensure respect of the injured State's rights is deemed to be indispensable by the majority of the authors who dealt with the matter. 103/ Some writers, for example, believe that the mere existence (in a general treaty or in a compromissory clause) of an obligation to go to arbitration by an ad hoc agreement (such obligation being merely a pactum de contrahendo) would not be sufficient to preclude resort to measures. The reprisals resorted to, however, should either have a merely provisional (interim measures) function or be intended to coerce the allegedly law-breaking State to conclude the ad hoc agreement. 104/ While believing, on the other hand, that the existence between the parties of a really compulsory jurisdiction - namely a jurisdictional link allowing the allegedly injured State to start arbitral or judicial proceedings by unilateral application - would normally foreclose direct resort to measures, the same scholars think that no obstacle would even in such a case exist to resort to unilateral interim measures unless where the competent body had no power to issue an order for interim measures or where such an order were not complied with by the allegedly law-breaking State. 105/

57. At the side of the nature, availability and degree of effectiveness of a possibly relevant settlement procedure, one must thus take account, according to a part of the literature, of the aim pursued by the measures envisaged or resorted to by the injured State: a matter recently explored

103/ According to Elagab "if it transpires that there is in reality a definite commitment to peaceful settlement between the parties concerned, resort to countermeasures by either party must be considered as prima facie unlawful. This general rule applies particularly where the treaty containing that rule establishes mechanisms for ensuring its implementation. There may, however, be situations in which the desired mechanisms prove inadequate. It is here that an aggrieved State could justifiably resort to countermeasures on the basis of customary law." (op. cit., p.183).

by Dominica. According to this scholar, one must distinguish reprisals aimed at securing reparation from reprisals which, by way of reaction to a continuing wrongful act, also pursue, by cessation, compliance with the obligation which is being infringed. A prior sommation, together with an arbitration proposal, would be a condition of resort to reprisals in the former case only. Resort to reprisals would be lawful in such a case, only where the arbitration proposal - and, of course, sommation - had been of no avail. In the case where the wrongful conduct was still in progress, provisional measures or measures intended to induce cessation and/or arbitration should lawfully be resorted to immediately regardless of settlement procedure commitments. In any case, measures taken by the injured State following non-compliance by the law-breaking State with an arbitral decision, would also be lawful.

58. Particular attention is paid to the provisional, protective nature of the measures and to the effectiveness of the competent power of the bodies in Professor Riphagen's draft Article 10. According to the first paragraph of that Article no measure (other than a "reciprocity" measure of the kind contemplated in our predecessor's draft Article 8) could be resorted to by the injured State "until it has exhausted the international procedures for peaceful settlement of the dispute available to it". The second paragraph, however, exempts from the prohibition "(a) interim measures of protection taken by the injured State within its jurisdiction, until a competent international court or tribunal, under the applicable international procedure for peaceful settlement of the dispute, has decided on the admissibility of such interim measures of protection; (b) measures taken by the injured State if the State alleged to have committed the internationally wrongful act fails to comply with an interim measure of protection ordered by such international court or tribunal". It remains to be seen whether this provision is wholly satisfactory.

107/ In the same sense, Pueyo Losa, op. cit., pp. 27 ff. Also Elagab recently stresses the necessity to take account of the different motivations behind the measures taken (op. cit., pp. 183 ff.).

108/ A further element of the present summary review of the doctrinal positions on the subject is the Restatement of the Law Third of the American Law Institute. The text of paragraph 905 devoted to unilateral remedies does not, in fact, address itself expressly to the relationship between measures on one side, and dispute settlement obligations, on the other side (Restatement, op. cit., p. 380). The relevant comment, however, states that for resort to measures to be lawful it would be necessary, inter alia, that "the accused State ... rejects or ignores proposals for negotiation or third party resolution". Reference is made, on the other hand, not to possible bilateral settlement instruments in force between the parties but only to settlement procedures available within the framework of international organizations; "In a dispute between members of an international organization, there may be a requirement that the dispute be submitted to the dispute settlement procedures of the organization, and countermeasures are precluded before that procedure has been concluded or terminated without success" (ibid., p. 381). In the "Reporter's notes" one further reads that the lawfulness of countermeasures "disappears, however, once the case has been submitted to an international tribunal, and the tribunal is in a position to decide on interim measures of protection" (ibid., p. 387).
59. Here again, an adequate study of international practice - starting from an articulate classification of dispute settlement instruments from the viewpoint of their respective degrees of strictness and effectiveness - is indispensable before choosing the best possible solutions. And here again the search should be conducted with the dual purpose of assessing lex lata with the utmost precision and devising the improvements which might reasonably be proposed for the law of unilateral countermeasures to be more advanced in the interest of justice (see para. 4 above).

60. Indeed, it will be surely difficult that States accept in the envisaged Part Three of the draft Articles, really significant innovations with regard to the settlement of disputes on the interpretation and application of the rules of the proposed Convention on State Responsibility. Considering that the impact of such rules would extend to any area of international law - namely to the violation of any primary norms or principles of written or unwritten international law and the consequences thereof - any binding settlement commitments eventually accepted by States under the said Part Three would extend to the whole area of their relationships which may give rise to controversy. A clear reflection of such difficulties is to be found in the scarcity of binding settlement commitments envisaged in draft Articles 1-5 of Part Three of the project as proposed by our predecessor, Professor Riphagen, 109/ and in the great caution manifested by the members of the Commission in the debate over those provisions. 110/

61. While not excluding the possibility that more significant steps be taken with regard to the content of the said Part Three, another matter, surely, are the rules to be worked out by the Commission with regard to the impact of dispute settlement commitments upon the lawfulness of unilateral reactions to internationally wrongful acts. In that respect the present Special Rapporteur is inclined to believe that more could and should be done - once the existing situation were adequately determined - in order to protect by adequate rules any party in a State responsibility relationship which had accepted dispute settlement commitments and was ready to comply therewith. Any rules of that kind would concur, at one and the same time, to reduce arbitrary resort to measures by the arrogant and to promote, together with the just solution of any controversy arising from any specific internationally wrongful act, the conclusion by States of effective bilateral or multilateral instruments of dispute settlement in increasingly broader areas.

62. It is on the basis of such considerations that one should try to answer questions such as: - whether under Charter Article 2, paragraph 3 and the provisions of Article 33 no measures should be resorted to by an injured State before resorting to one or more of the means listed in the latter article; - whether there are any measures an injured State would or should be entitled to resort to without waiting for an unsuccessful attempt to use any such means of settlement: for example, interim measures or measures intended to induce the counterpart to comply with any settlement obligations; - whether and under what conditions, in particular, the fact that a settlement or quasi-settlement procedure had attained a given stage of progress would restrict the faculté of resort to given measures.

Chapter VI

The Problem of Proportionality

63. One of the most crucial aspects of countermeasures is the question of proportionality. A rule of proportionality has surely assumed a stricter and more precise content during the part of the present century which has followed the First World War: a development concomitant with the condemnation of the use of force. Nevertheless, the notion of proportionality was already present more or less explicitly in the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth century doctrine. It was clearly implied in the doctrinal position taken, for example, by Grotius, Vattel and Phillimore, that goods seized by way of reprisal were lawfully appropriated by the injured sovereign, "so far as is necessary to satisfy the original debt that caused, and the expenses incurred by the Reprisal; the residue is to be returned to the Government of the subjects against whom reprisals have been put in force". 111/

64. Most twentieth century authors are of the opinion that a State resorting to reprisals should adhere to the principle of proportionality. Oppenheim holds that "[r]eprisals, be they positive or negative, must be in proportion to the wrong done, and to the amount of compulsion necessary to get reparation". 112/ In Guggenheim's words "[d]as moderne Völkerrecht weist sodann eine Verpflichtung zur Proportionalität der Repressalie auf". 113/ Overcoming the doubts expressed by Anzilotti in the twenties and Strupp in the thirties 114/ the rest of the doctrine seems unanimous in considering proportionality as a hard and fast rule of international law. Among the distinguished authors who recognize the principle of proportionality as a general requirement for the legitimacy of reprisals, are Bourquin, 115/

113/ Guggenheim, P., op. cit., p. 585.

114/ The former considered the rule of proportionality merely as a moral norm (Anzilotti, D., op. cit., pp. 167); Strupp, K., did not believe in the existence of rules establishing proportions which had to be observed in the exercise of reprisals (op. cit., pp. 568-569).

115/ Bourquin, op. cit., p. 223.
65. There is no uniformity, however — either in the practice or the doctrine — with regard to the exact concept of proportionality. A difference can be detected, for example, between the doctrine based upon the well known jurisprudential dictum on the Naulilaa Case and the International Law Institute's definition. The first held that "même si l'on admettait que le droit des gens n'exige pas que la représaille se mesure approximativement à l'offense, on devrait certainement considérer comme excessives et partant illicites, des représailles hors de toute proportion avec l'acte qui les a motivées". 127/ More severely, the International Law Institute seems to destroyed, on that occasion, six Portuguese military posts in Angola in response to the killing of two German officers and an official in the Portuguese fortified place of Naulilaa. The Tribunal rejected the German contention that its action had been justified as a reprisal, on these accounts: — first because the death of the German personnel could not be considered as an unlawful act of the Portuguese authorities; second, because the German reaction had not been preceded by any "sommation préalable"; finally, because there had been no "proportion admissible entre l'offense allégée et les représailles exercées." Ibid., p. 1028.

require that the measure be proportional to the gravity of the offence and of the damage suffered. 128/ A less strict concept seems to emerge from the pronouncement of the scholars from whom emanated the Air Services award, 129/ according to which "[i]t is generally agreed that all countermeasures must, in the first instance, have some degree of equivalence with the alleged breach" and "[i]t has been observed, generally, that judging the 'proportionality' of countermeasures is not an easy task and can be at best be accomplished by approximation". On this basis the arbitrators had concluded that "[t]he measures taken by the United States do not appear to be clearly disproportionate when compared to those taken by France". 130/

66. According to our distinguished predecessor's formulation of paragraph 2 of Article 9, "the exercise of the right (of injured States) shall not, in its effects, be manifestly disproportionate to the seriousness of the act". 131/

128/ According to the resolution of 1934, the acting State must "proportionner la contrainte employée à la gravité de l'acte dénoncé comme illicite et à l'importance du dommage subi", (Article 6, paragraph 2, in Ann. IDI 1934, Vol. 38, p. 709).

131/ YBILC, Vol. II, (Part One) 1985, p. 11. Not quite clearly, Riphagen distinguishes a qualitative and a quantitative disproportion. Under the first, a measure would be justified only where the breach committed by way of countermeasure responds to an internationally wrongful act consisting in the violation of the same obligation or of an obligation of the same kind or - if we understand correctly, of an obligation closely connected with the infringed obligation. According to the cited scholar, this hypothesis would be characterized by the coming into play of the concept of "self-protection" and the nature of the wrongful act and of the rights of the offending State: "Within the framework of qualitative proportionality, the admissibility of measures of self-help is obviously the most dubious, since such measures necessarily involve an infringement of rights of the author State. Accordingly, reprisals are generally considered as allowed only in limited forms and in limited cases. The nature of internationally wrongful acts and the nature of the rights of the author State infringed by the reprisal are relevant here." (Fourth Report, op. cit., para. 80, p. 15). More simply, quantitative proportionality would be the proportionality of the damages (injuries) caused to the offending State by the measure to the damages (injuries) suffered by the acting State. According to Riphagen himself, however, the two kinds of proportionality would not be separable; they would be two sides, so to speak, of the same coin (Preliminary Report, YBILC 1980, Vol. II, (Part One) Doc. A/CN.4/330, paras. 94-95).
A similar concept seems to be set forth in the cited Restatement Third, Article 905 paragraph 1 (b), according to which an injured State "may resort to countermeasures that might otherwise be unlawful, if such measures ... (b) are not out of proportion to the violation and the injury suffered". 132/

67. Another issue emerging from the literature is whether proportionality is required with reference to the wrongful act per se, to the effects thereof, to the specific – mediate or intermediate – aim of the measure, or to any two or more of such elements together. While reference of proportionality to the violation (namely to the importance of the breached rule and of the breach) is very frequent, 133/ also frequent is reference to the damage or injury caused by the breach. 134/ Reference is also made in the literature to the aims in view of which countermeasures are taken. The question would be to know whether the aims pursued by the injured State's measures are or not relevant, together with the nature and gravity of the breach and the effects thereof, for the purpose of determining the presence or absence of proportionality. 135/ Some authors seem indeed to connect proportionality both to the injury suffered and the aim pursued while keeping the two elements separate. Skubiszewski, for example, asserts that reprisals must be "proportionate to the injury suffered" adding however that they must not involve "the application of compulsion in an amount that goes beyond what would be necessary to secure a settlement". 136/ According to McDougal (who presumably had in mind, however,

132/ Restatement of the Law Third, op. cit., para. 905 (b). Of the same opinion seem to be Alland, op. cit., p. 184; Malanzuk, op. cit., p. 214; Conforti, B., op. cit., p. 360; Cassese, op. cit., p. 271. Proportionality, in our view, should be connected with the degree of fault (dolus or culpa in a narrow sense) by which the wrongful act is characterized.

133/ In this respect the Arbitral Award in the Naulilaa case has been of influence. In that award the notion of proportionality was linked to "l'acte qui ... a motivéles" the reprisals, UNRIAA, II, p. 1028. In the doctrine this is also by Guggenheim, P., op. cit., p. 585-586; Kelsen, H., Principles of International Law, op. cit., p. 21; and Kapoor, S.K., A Textbook of International Law, Allahabad, 1985, p. 625; Sereni, Diritto Internazionale, III, p. 1559.

134/ Reference to proportionality not only in regard to the damage suffered, inter alios, Venezia, J.C., op. cit., p. 476; De Guttry, A., op. cit., p. 263; Elagab, O.Y., op. cit.; p. 94, Fisler Damrosch, L., op. cit., p. 792; Zemanek, K., Unilateral Enforcement, op. cit., p. 87; and the Two Special Rapporteurs Ago (in YBILC, 1979, Vol. II (Part One), para. 82) and Riphagen (in his draft Article 9, paragraph 2). To the breach and the damage suffered seems to refer itself the resolution of the International Law Institute of 1934 quoted supra, para. 65.

135/ On the relevance of these aims: De Guttry, A., op. cit., pp. 263-64; Dominice, Ch., Observations, op. cit., pp. 64-66; Elagab, O.Y., op. cit., pp. 86 ff.

violent reprisals) "[i]t may be suggested ... that if reprisals are to signify something more than an adventitious 'survival of lex talionis', they should be adapted and related not so much to the past illegality but rather and primarily to the future purpose sought. It is a common emphasis that the legitimate purpose of reprisals is not the infliction of retribution but the deterrence of future unlawfulness. From such emphasis it would seem to follow that the kind and amount of permissible reprisal violence is that which is reasonably designed so to affect the enemy's expectation about the costs and gains of reiteration or continuation of its initial unlawful act as to induce the termination of and future abstention from such act. The quantum of permissible reprisal violence, so determined, may under certain circumstances, conceivably be greater than that inflicted in the enemy's original unlawful act". 137/

68. The noted differences advise us to consider State practice and international jurisprudence with the utmost care in order to choose the most suitable formulation of the law. One should determine, in particular, if proportionality should be required not only for the measures qualifying as reprisals stricto sensu, but also for the so-called reciprocity measures; - whether the latter are subject instead to such stricter requirements as identity or equivalence or whether they do not really differ from other reprisals except for the fact that they are more perfectly proportional, so to speak, to the gravity of the wrongful act and of the injury caused. One must further determine, in the light of a thorough analysis of practice, whether the requirement of proportionality should be formulated in broader or stricter terms and in connection with which elements: injury suffered, importance of the infringed rule, aim of the measure resorted to, or any combination of two or more of such elements. More satisfactory and articulate formulations could perhaps be found than those registered under paragraphs 65 and 66 above.

Chapter VII

The Régime of Suspension and Termination of Treaties as Countermeasures

69. A controversial matter is whether the legal régime of countermeasures — particularly with regard to prior demand of reparation, impact of dispute settlement obligations and proportionality — should undergo any adaptations where the measures resorted to consisted in the termination or suspension of a treaty or of any portion thereof. But before considering the distinct features that a part of the doctrine seems to identify in the régime of this particular kind of measures, a few remarks of a general nature seem to be appropriate.

70. Suspension and termination are mainly dealt with, in the literature of international law, as a part of the law of treaties and under the implied or explicit inspiration of well-known national law rules on suspension and termination of contracts. 138/ Within the said framework of the law of treaties, suspension and termination are notably dealt with as vicissitudes in the life of a treaty, 139/ such vicissitudes obviously including the consequences of non-compliance. It is within that context that doctrine and jurisprudence have worked out, around suspension and termination, rules concerning: (a) the kinds of treaty breaches that could justify suspension or termination; (b) the conditions in the presence of which a treaty could be suspended or terminated totally or in part; (c) the requirements to be complied with by the injured State lawfully to proceed to suspension or termination. And it is by way of codification and/or progressive development of the rules of general international law covering such matters that the Vienna Conference on the Law of Treaties adopted Article 60 of the 1969 Convention and the auxiliary provisions embodied in Articles 65–67, 70 and 72 of that Convention.

71. A different matter, however, are the rules of general international law concerning suspension and termination of treaties as unilateral measures available to the injured State in response to any internationally

138/ Both remedies are envisaged, in the literature and practice of private law, as typical of legal relationships circumscribed to the sphere of a contract.

139/ In a manner pretty similar, therefore, to the manner in which the more or less analogous vicissitudes of contracts are envisaged in private national law.
wrongful act. This subject, expressly not prejudged, as stated in Article 73 of the Vienna Convention, by Article 60 of that Convention (and by the cited accessory provisions of the same instrument), is a much broader one. It reaches not only beyond the vicissitudes of a given, single treaty (as in the case of the cited Article 60) but beyond the sphere of treaty law altogether. 141/

72. Indeed, the cited Article 60, the only one that is of interest in the present context, contemplates suspension and termination of a given treaty, only as possible reactions, on the part of the contracting States or any one of them, to a breach — and a material breach for that matter — of one or more rules of that same treaty. The legal régime of suspension and termination of treaties within the framework of the instrumental consequences of an internationally wrongful act covers or should cover instead (de lege lata or de lege ferenda) such hypotheses of resort to these measures as:
(i) suspension or termination of a treaty (or any rule or part thereof) in response to an infringement of one or more of the obligations deriving from the same treaty; (ii) but, far beyond that area (which is roughly the area covered by Article 60), suspension or termination of a treaty (or any rule or part thereof) in response to a breach of any other treaty or treaties;

140/ Article 73 reads: "The provisions of the present Convention shall not prejudge any question that may arise in regard to a treaty from a succession of States or from the international responsibility of a State or from the outbreak of hostilities between States". One should also consider, of course, the explanation of the exclusion of State responsibility from the Vienna Convention régime (as a whole) given by the Commission itself prior to the very adoption of Article 73: "The draft Articles do not contain provisions concerning the question of the international responsibility of the State with respect to a failure to perform a treaty obligation. This question — stated the Commission in its 1964 Report — would involve not only the general principles governing reparation to be made for a breach of a treaty, but also the grounds which may be invoked in justification for the non-performance of a treaty. As these matters form part of the general topic of the international responsibility of States, which is to be the subject of separate examination by the Commission, it decided to exclude them in connection with its study of international responsibility of States". YBILC 1966, Vol. II, p. 117. See on this point Rosenne, S., Breach of Treaty, Cambridge, 1985, pp. 3-5, and "Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties", in Enc. of Pub. Int. Law, Vol. VII, pp. 525 ff.

141/ Accordingly, this interpretation of the relationship between the law of treaties and the law of State responsibility, has recently been supported by the Arbitral Tribunal in the decision of the Rainbow Warrior Case between New Zealand and France. See paras. 73 ff. of the Award and the comment by Palmisano, G., Sulla decisione arbitrale relativa alla seconda fase del caso "Rainbow Warrior", in Riv. Dir. Int., 1990, Nr. 4, pp. 885-889. For a different interpretation of the said relationship see Bowett, D., "Treaty and State Responsibility", in Mélange Virally, Paris, 1991.
and (iii) suspension or termination of a treaty (or any rule or portion thereof) in response to a breach of a rule of general international law, whether an ordinary customary rule or principle or a peremptory rule.

73. It is well known that the interpretation of Article 60 is not uncontroversial. It is also controversial whether and to what extent the content of that Article coincides with the existing general law on suspension and termination of treaties. 142/ Be it as it may of such issues, the provision set forth in Article 60 can in no way be considered to exhaust the legal régime of suspension and termination for the purposes of the general régime of State responsibility. More precisely, the provisions of Articles 60 exhaust: (i) neither the régime of all the measures that can be resorted to in connection with a breach of a given treaty; (ii) nor the régime of the various measures (suspension and termination included) which may be resorted to in connection with the infringement of any obligation arising from any rule of international law, whether created by treaty or by custom.

74. It follows that the legal régime of suspension and termination of treaties must first of all be studied in the light of the rules and principles tentatively explored so far with regard to countermeasures in general. 143/

142/ The coincidence may result either from the fact that the content of Article 60 constitutes a mere translation into written form of the existing general law of the matter or from the fact that the content of the relevant part of general international law got at some later stage to reflect (and then to conform with) the régime embodied in Article 60. The question (which we leave open for the present time) is a rather controversial one.

143/ Even when they are resorted to following a violation of treaty rights, suspension and termination are just two of the forms of remedial action available to the injured State. See on this point Cavaglieri: "Parmi les causes qui ne déterminent pas directement ipso iure, l'extinction d'un traité mais réalisent cet effet dans la mesure où l'État intéressé invoque son droit à l'abrogation du traité, il y a sans aucun doute, à notre avis, l'inexécution par une des parties d'une ou de plusieurs dispositions du traité même. Cette inexécution n'entraîne pas nécessairement, automatiquement, la disparition du traité. Celui-ci, malgré l'inexécution plus ou moins grave de la part de l'un des contractants, garde toute sa vigueur, produit tous ses effets. L'autre partie peut, en présence de cette infraction, choisir la voie qu'elle croit la plus conforme à son intérêt. Elle peut tolérer l'inexécution sans aucune réaction de sa part: ou exiger que le traité soit régulièrement exécuté et demander à l'État coupable la réparation des dommages souffert; ou méconnaître à son tour, à titre de réciprocité, la règle violée. Mais l'inexécution du traité l'autorise également à se considérer comme dégagée de ses obligations, à déclarer qu'elle n'est plus liée par aucune clause de ce traité." Règles du droit de la paix, in Hague Rec., 1929, p. 534; Sereni, Diritto internazionale, III Milano 1962, p. 1479; Sinha, Unilateral Denunciation of Treaty Because of Prior Violations of Obligations by Other Party, The Hague 1966, p. 206; Guggenheim, Traité, Vol. I, op. cit., p. 219 ff.; Morelli, op. cit., p. 327; Jimenez de Aréchaga, "International Law in the Past Third of a Century", Hague Rec., 1978-I, p. 79; Dominice, Observations, op. cit., p. 28.
We refer to such rules as those concerning the substantive and procedural requirements, conditions, limitations and modalities of countermeasures: namely, the obligations or oner to be satisfied by the injured State prior to resort to measures; and the requirement of proportionality. It must notably be determined whether the particular features of suspension and termination affect in any measure - and eventually in what sense - their subject to the conditions and requirements to be fulfilled for any other countermeasure to be lawfully taken, particularly as regards sommation and dispute settlement obligations.

75. The very first question that arises is whether suspension and termination may be resorted to by way of reaction to any kind of internationally wrongful act or only in case of unlawful acts of a certain kind. It is known that in this regard a distinction is generally made within the framework of the law of treaties. While termination would be admissible only in the presence of a material violation of the (same) treaty, suspension would also be admissible - in general international law - in case of minor violations. Article 60 of the Vienna Convention is generally considered to have opted for a more restrictive régime of suspension as well as termination - namely for the requirement in both cases of a material breach - in order to safeguard the continuity and stability of the treaty. Under the law of treaties - at least as set forth in the cited Article 60 - minor violations should not bring about either termination or suspension.

76. A choice will have to be made at that point between two ways in which the said restrictions would be called to operate. One possibility would be that, within the wider perspective of the law of State responsibility, those restrictions be envisaged as specific, particular rules applicable to the suspension and termination of treaties. Another possibility is that the restrictions in question be envisaged merely as the result of the operation, with regard to suspension and termination, of the rules or principles governing countermeasures in general, regardless of the conventional framework within which the two said remedies apply. The same problem arises for the questions, so familiar to those who study the international law of treaties, under the labels of "qualitative proportionality" and "separability" of the provisions to be suspended or terminated.

77. With regard to the first question its typical sphere of application is represented precisely by the context of suspension or termination of a treaty in response to a violation of the same treaty. According to Simma, for instance, while qualitative proportionality - or proportionality "in kind" - would not be required by international law for measures, so to speak, of common reprisals, it would instead be an indispensable feature of lawfulness of suspension or termination within the framework of the law of treaties.\textsuperscript{146} In a similar sense expresses herself Forlati.\textsuperscript{147} The concept of qualitative proportionality (or, which amounts to the same, the concept of suspension or termination by way of reciprocity) leads thus the majority of writers on the law of treaties to assert that whenever the infringed part of the treaty is separable from the rest of the treaty, suspension or termination is only admissible for the part of the treaty which is affected by the infringement. The injured State would be bound not to put into question the rest of the treaty.\textsuperscript{148}

78. In connection with "contractual" or "conventional" countermeasures another particular problem arises with regard to requirements such as prior demand of cessation or reparation and prior resort to available settlement procedures. Although a prior demand for cessation or reparation seems generally to be a mandatory precondition for resort to unilateral remedial measures consisting in the violation of a general rule, the same requirement does not seem to be equally firm in the case of resort to suspension of compliance with a treaty obligation or to termination. According actually to a part of the literature, suspension and termination would seem to be among the rare cases of measures lawful resort to which would not be dependent on a prior demand of cessation or reparation. In that sense express themselves, inter alios, Reitzer,\textsuperscript{149} McNair,\textsuperscript{150} Lattanzi.\textsuperscript{151}

\textsuperscript{147} According to Forlati, M.L., while the principle of proportionality governs "resort to suspension on the basis of the general principle of self-help (reprisals, self-help in a narrow sense and self-defence)", in the cases of "termination or suspension under the principle inadimplenti non est adimplendum, proportionality is substituted by a more specific criterion, namely by the principle, typical synallagma, of quid pro quo (corrispettivo)" (La sanzione, op. cit., p. 92).

\textsuperscript{148} Compare, for example, the comment to Article 30 of the Harvard draft (AJIL 1935, Vol. 29, Suppl. 4, pp. 1134-1144); McNair, op. cit., pp. 570-573; Sinha, op. cit., p. 90. Also Article 60, at least with regard to suspension, uses the expression "suspending the operation of the treaty in whole or in part".

79. Another part of the doctrine seems inclined instead to believe that as well as other forms of unilateral reactions, also suspension and termination should be preceded by an unsuccessful demand of compliance with the "primary" or "secondary" obligation. Guggenheim, for instance, thinks that the unilateral termination of the treaty for non-compliance should be preceded by a fruitless sommation accompanied by a reasonable deadline for the lawbreaker to comply with the injured State's claim. Simma deems the practice and jurisprudence to indicate that: "[w]hen a State esteems that it has been injured by a material breach of a treaty, it is not at liberty immediately to resort to unilateral termination, but has to follow a certain procedure. It will normally start with the registering of a reclamation calling for resumption of performance or for a reply to the claim of termination within a reasonable time. Only on those rather rare occasions where the defaulting State admits from the beginning that it has substantially violated the agreement concerned or where it does not reply at all to the reclamation, may the innocent State then proceed with the termination. In all cases, however, where the allegedly defaulting State denies either the fact of the violation or its character of being a material breach there will be a "difference", a legal solution of which is only possible with the agreement of the parties. In any case, it is a difference highly suitable for settlement by reference to an international court or tribunal. Unilateral termination of the broken treaty is only permitted after the State injured by the breach has tried in vain to arrive at an agreement with the violator." In that sense had expressed himself Fitzmaurice in his Reports to the ILC on the Law of Treaties. According to him the parties intending to claim termination or invalidity of the treaty must notify and motivate their claim to the counterpart, and then, after the claim has been rejected or not satisfied within a reasonable delay, offer the counterpart to submit the question to the judgement of an arbitral tribunal or, failing acceptance of arbitration, to the ICJ. Only if such an offer is not accepted within a reasonable delay, performance of the treaty can be unilaterally suspended; and only after the lapse of six months without any acceptance of the settlement procedures proposal, the treaty will be terminated by unilateral decision.

80. Once again, it will be for international practice to advise us - de lege lata as well as de lege ferenda - as to whether resort to suspension or termination should be subject to any ad hoc régime. Should or should not such resort be subject to different, and presumably less strict, conditions and requirements than those applying to countermeasures resorted to outside of a treaty framework?

81. A point which is of relevance to the absolute limitations of unilateral measures in general but raises particular problems in connection with treaty suspension or termination relates to the hypothesis where resort to one or the other of such remedies would affect the rights of States other than the law-breaking State. The question here is whether and to what extent it may be lawful for a State to suspend or terminate, by way of countermeasure, a multilateral treaty. The literature is notoriously in disagreement in that respect. Fitzmaurice, for example, considering the variety of the kinds of obligations deriving from a multilateral treaty, proposes a distinction. On one side he places reciprocal obligations, namely, the so-called "reciprocal" or "divisible" obligations. On another side he places the obligations requiring an integral compliance (namely, the so-called "indivisible" or "integral" obligations). A suspension or termination measure could thus lawfully be taken by the injured State unilaterally under the generally applicable (relative or absolute) limitations or conditions, with respect to any "divisible" or "reciprocal" obligation binding the injured State vis-à-vis the law-breaking State. On the contrary, no suspension or termination measure can lawfully be taken by the injured State unilaterally with regard to any "indivisible" or "integral" obligation (deriving from the infringed multilateral treaty) non-compliance with which would constitute a violation of the treaty to the detriment of any States participating in the treaty other than the law-breaking State, such detriment going beyond the merely juridical injury inherent in the very infringement of a treaty to which a State is a party.

155/ Fitzmaurice, Second Report, Article 19, YBILC 1957, Vol. II, p. 54, para. 154. The comment to Article 27 of the Harvard draft convention identifies, among the kinds of obligations deriving from a multilateral treaty, those the violation of which infringes directly and particularly the rights of only one of the parties (see AJIL, Vol. 29, Suppl. 4, 1935, pp. 1092-1093). Sereni, for his part, identifies instead that kind of multilateral treaty the violation of an obligation of which, even on the part of one party, frustrates the object and the purpose of the whole treaty for all the parties (Diritto internazionale, Vol. III, pp. 1481-1482). Another part of the doctrine does not distinguish instead, among the various kinds of obligations deriving from a multilateral treaty, mostly in the belief, on one side, that termination would in principle be inadmissible when any participating States are in the position of "third" States (vis-à-vis the violation) which could be injured by the measure (termination); on the other side, that suspension would instead be admissible (Guggenheim, Traité, Vol. I, op. cit., pp. 228-229; McNair, The Law of Treaties, op. cit., p. 580; Morelli, Nozioni, op. cit., pp. 327-328; Kelsen, Principles of International Law, op. cit., p. 358).
82. Partly in conformity with the views just recalled is draft Article 11, paragraph 1, as proposed by Professor Riphagen in 1985, which reads:

"The injured State is not entitled to suspend the performance of its obligations towards the State which has committed the internationally wrongful act to the extent that such obligations are stipulated in a multilateral treaty to which both States are parties and it is established that:

(a) the failure to perform such obligations by one State party necessarily affects the exercise of the rights or the performance of obligations of all other States parties to the treaty; or

(b) such obligations are stipulated for the protection of collective interests of the States parties to the multilateral treaty; or

(c) such obligations are stipulated for the protection of individual persons irrespective of their nationality". 156/

83. The question will be to see whether suspension and termination of multilateral treaties, or of certain kinds thereof, should in the project be the object of separate consideration or whether the problem should be envisaged within the different broader perspective of the violation, by way of countermeasure, of rules setting forth erga omnes obligations. The problem would thus be dealt with in a more general way regardless of the contractual or customary nature of the rules involved. 157/

Chapter VIII

The Issue of So-called Self-contained Régimes

84. Related to the possible "speciality" of measures consisting in the infringement of treaty rules is the question of the relationship between the general rules on State responsibility on the one hand and any ad hoc rules that a given treaty or set of treaties may set forth in order to provide for the case of its violation. This problem seems to arise in the presence of those conventional systems or combinations of systems which tend to resolve within their own - contractual and special - context the legal régime of a more or less considerable number of relationships among the participating States, including in particular the consequences of the breaches of the participating States' obligations under the system. Such consequences include, in some cases, special, at times institutionalized, measures against violations. It would follow that the systems in question may affect in a measure, more or less explicitly, the faculté of the participating States to resort to the remedial measures which are open to them under general international law. It seems to be in connection with situations of such a kind that a part of the doctrine speaks, within the framework of the law of State responsibility, of "self-contained" régimes. 158/

85. The most typical - and perhaps the most likely - example of such régimes is probably the "system" set up by the treaties establishing the European Community and the relations resulting therefrom. 159/ Another example

158/ According to Riphagen, for example, the systems under consideration would constitute "subsystem(s)", namely, "an ordered set of conduct rules, procedural rules and status provisions, which formed a closed legal circuit, for a particular field of factual relationships" (YBILC, 1982, I, p. 202, para. 16). Within any such system primary rules and secondary rules are closely intertwined and are inseparable. The concept is understood differently by Simma, who uses the expression "self-contained régime" in a narrow and more specific sense "to designate a certain category of subsystems, namely those embracing, in principle, a full (exhaustive and definite) set of secondary rules. A "self-contained régime" would then be a subsystem which is intended to exclude more or less totally the application of the general legal consequences of wrongful acts, in particular the application of the countermeasures normally at the disposal of an injured party" (Simma, "Self-Contained Regimes", in NYIL, 1985, pp. 115-116). In particular, according to Simma, the concept of "self-contained régime" would not be appropriate for those subsystems which provide that in case of failure of a special remedy built into the treaty, a more general remedy based upon another treaty (subsystem) or customary international law becomes (re-)applicable (ibid., p. 117).

frequently evoked by writers, including the previous Special Rapporteur Professor Riphagen, would be the "conventional system created by human rights treaties." 160/ A self-contained régime consisting of a particularly obvious combination of customary as well as treaty rules would be, according to an ICJ dictum, "the law of diplomatic relations". 161/ The question arising with regard to these "régimes" is whether the existence of remedies specifically provided for within them - remedies at times more advanced - affect in any measure the legal possibility for the participating States to resort to the measures provided for or otherwise lawful under general international law. 86. It should immediately be added, however, that although a problem of "speciality" is generally seen as arising particularly in connection with the régime of countermeasures - and perhaps rightly so - it is not confined thereto. Any real or alleged self-contained régime may also concern other consequences of internationally wrongful acts, first of all what we referred to as the substantive consequences covered by draft Articles 6 to 10 as proposed by us and at present before the Commission's Drafting Committee (cessation, restitution in kind, pecuniary compensation, etc.). 87. The problem concerns, grosso modo, the whole scope of Part Two of the project. As such, this problem should not be dealt with in the section of Part Two concerning countermeasures. It would be dealt with more appropriately within the Section or Chapter of Part Two covering the general principles of the content, forms and degrees of international responsibility. In particular, it is a matter in many ways close to the general problem covered by draft Article 2 of that Chapter. While reserving ourselves to deal with it provisionally in one of the conclusive provisions of the Chapter at present under consideration, we must keep in mind that the relevant draft Article will have to be inserted in its proper place during the second reading of the general principles Chapter. 88. We deem it therefore premature to enter here into a discussion of the so-called "self-contained" régimes. The more so as the substantial material collected so far on the subject leads us to wonder whether and to what extent the concept of "self-contained" régimes is really of relevance for the solution of the problems of State responsibility in connection with which that concept has been brought into the picture so far. 160/ Riphagen, Fourth Report on State Responsibility, YBILC, 1983, Vol. II (Part One), pp. 15 ff.; Simma, B., op. ult. cit., pp. 130 ff.; Meron, T., Human Rights and Humanitarian Norms as Customary Law, Oxford, 1989, pp. 230 ff. 161/ ICJ Rep. 1980, p. 38.
